After an 8-week treatment of 6% polyethylene glycol solution, sunflower (Helianthus annuus L. cv. Mountain Rose) plantlets were found to be chlorotic and showed leaf senescence. No signs of chlorosis and/or leaf senescence were observed in control plantlets. The chlorophyll content in leaves of drought-treated plants dropped to 10.5% of that of control plantlets, while the total chlorophyll content in old leaves decreased. An examination of the ratio of Chl (a) to Chl (b) in the light-absorbing pigments of the leaves revealed a remarkable lower ratio of 0.33 compared to 0.67 in control plantlets. Interestingly, a reduction of the total chlorophyll content in dry matter was observed in drought-treated plantlets. A comparison of the ascorbate/dehydroascorbate ratio with the relative amount of bound peroxides in plant leaves revealed that drought stress caused disturbances in the electron-transport chain, where the chlorophyll content and the ascorbate/dehydroascorbate ratio decreased.INTRODUCTION (#sec1-1) ===== Retroperitoneal paragangliomas are rare tumors, with an incidence of 2-3 per one million population.[[@ref1]] They usually present as a painless abdominal mass. Symptoms are related to local effects of the tumor (tumor bulk) or of the surrounding structures (mass effect, peritoneal irritation) rather than with distant metastases.[[@ref1]] The majority of these tumors are benign and most of them can be treated by local excision, whereas malignant and aggressive forms require a more radical surgical approach. The best diagnostic approach is represented by magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) and/or computed tomography (CT). CT is helpful for the location and for the pre-surgical planning. While, MRI presents with better soft tissue contrast, allows the examination of larger tumor bulk and provides a good alternative to CT in the assessment of the resectability. Furthermore, the use of
